

Movies breed crime

Description

Yes – Movies breed crime:

- In many movies, the lead character hurts and kills villains and then the movie ends. They do not get punished by law nor do they get judged by society for their crimes. In general, people get connected with lead characters and tend to imitate them. So, these kinds of movies are a bad influence and can breed crime.
- In many Indian movies, the lead character sees a girl, loves her and then follows her obsessively till she accepts his proposal. Many such movies do not even show the pain the girl goes through in such situations. This is the reason stalking is very common in India and many girls are being killed for not accepting love proposals. This is proof that movies breed crime.
- People can learn how to commit crimes by watching crimes in movies. Some movies are like guides for criminals.

No:

- Movies depict real lives. They are just showing what is already happening in society so that means films do not encourage crimes in general.
- Some people are inherently bad. They won't change for good if they were shown movies that encourage good deeds and helping nature. So, movies cannot change the innate characteristics of people.

Conclusion:

Most of the movies depict real lives. So, they show what is already happening in society. But filmmakers do have the responsibility to send a good message to society and should take care that their movies do not breed crime. It is better to let the audience know the consequences of crimes even if it is done by the lead character in the movies. Everyone should be made aware that lawbreakers will surely get punishment in courts.

Your Turn...

Do you think movies breed crime? Express your thoughts through the comment section below. And subscribe to our blog to read answers to the trending GD topics.

Photo by cottonbro from Pexels

Copyright @ Group Discussion Ideas.